From the West

On the deck of the conquered US frigate "Chesapeake" during the War of 1812, one of the ship's officers knelt by the side of one of the enlisted men, a gunner and a "craftsman". The Chesapeake, with it's deck covered in damaged gear and the blood of it's heroic men, had just lost the battle with the British ship "Shannon"

As the officer aided the enlisted man, Lord Wallace, First Lieutenant of the Shannon, climbed aboard and took in the scene. Wallace expressed surprise that an officer would be aiding an enlisted man until he was informed by the American officer that both men were Masons. Upon this information, Lord Wallace also knelt down and both men held their dying Masonic Brother's hand until he passed on.

The blood and death of this common seaman cemented a friendship between the two officers that lasted a lifetime
